

Sgt. Jack Dixon 1463894 RAFVR

Jack Dixon was the wireless operator of a No. 153 Squadron Lancaster lost in an attack on the city of Chemnitz, deep in eastern Germany, in the early spring of 1945.

The attack was part of Operation Thunderclap, which had also included the attack on the nearby city of Dresden three weeks earlier.

It took place on the night of 5/6 March 1945 and involved 760 Lancasters and Halifaxes, of which 22 would be lost including William Bailey's PB872 P4-X.

It had left RAF Scampton at 1640 hours and some five hours later was seen on fire over the Ore Mountain areas, near the target city. It appeared the crew was attempting an emergency landing but a wing broke away and the Lancaster crashed in a forested area at Rossbach (now Hranice in the Czech Republic). The Lancaster may have been hit by flak, but it is also believed to have been claimed by Luftwaffe night-fighter pilot Major Walter Burchersem, who was flying a Me110 that night.

There were no survivors and the crew, who were on their sixth operation with 153 Squadron, were buried locally. In 1947 their bodies were reinterred in Prague War Cemetery and in 1991 a small monument in memory of the crew was erected at the crash site.

Jack came from the small Norfolk village of East Ruston, between Norwich and Cromer. He was 24, the son of Walter and Rosa Dixon and is remembered on Stalham War Memorial in St Mary's Church.

Those killed with him were the pilot F/O William Bailey, flight engineer Sgt. Jim Howard, navigator F/O Reg Adlam RNZAF, bomb-aimer F/O Ted Morris, mid-upper gunner Sgt. Bill Meechan and rear gunner Sgt. Walter Simpson.

His name can be found on IBCC panel 029.
