

Sgt. John Harold McVey
1556369 RAFVR

Lancaster bomb-aimer John McVey was killed along with the rest of his crew a few days after being posted to No. 626 Squadron at Wickenby.

John and his crew had completed their training at 1667 Heavy Conversion Unit at Sandtoft on 16 April 1944 and, after a couple of cross-country and practice bombing exercises, he and his crew took off at 2113 hours on the night of 24 April on board Lancaster ED424 UM-E2 heading for the major city of Karlsruhe in south-west Germany.

Their Lancaster was one of 637 bombers, 19 of which were lost during a raid that was later deemed to be only a partial success with cloud and winds affecting the marking. ED424, an ex-12 Squadron aircraft, was attacked by a night-fighter and shot down in a forested area near the French town of Haguenau, close to the German border. There were no survivors.

During the raid, one of the WAAFs manning the Wickenby Control Room was Vera Craddock from Sunderland. Her husband, 21-year-old Flt. Sgt. Ronald Craddock, was on board ED424 and their daughter, Joy, was born almost eight months later.

John came from the Cathcart area of Glasgow and was the 21-year-old son of John and Margaret McVey.

The others who died were the pilot Flt. Sgt. Frederick Baker, flight engineer Sgt. Frederick Kimber, navigator Flt. Sgt. Eric Eyres, wireless operator Flt. Sgt. Ronald Craddock, mid-upper gunner Sgt. Bernard Kimber and rear gunner Sgt. Frank Skelly. All are buried in the French National Cemetery at Haguenau.

His name can be found on panel 073.

Sources: 626 Squadron's Lost Lancasters.