Joe Morris headed a young crew killed within six weeks of joining 550 Squadron at RAF North Killingholme.

He and his crew had arrived at the 1 Group airfield on 20 October 1944 after completing a course at 1 Lancaster Finishing School at Hemswell. They were to fly their first operation under the guidance of the experienced Flt. Lt. 'Jock' Shaw on what was the 100th operation of 550's centenarian Lancaster, 'Press on Regardless', on 2 November. Six of them were to be killed, along with a replacement wireless operator, on 6 December when their aircraft failed to return from an attack on the Leuna oil refinery, near Leipzig.

On that raid they were flying Lancaster NG251 BQ-J, which left North Killingholme at 1634 hours. Over the target area their aircraft was badly damaged by flak and crashed at Dolzig, not far from Leipzig. There were no survivors. It is believed they were buried locally before their bodies were recovered by an American graves registration unit and reburied in cemeteries in Germany and Holland.

Joe Morris came from Stratford-on-Avon in Warwickshire where he lived with his wife Mary. He was 23 and the son of Thomas and Edith Morris.

Killed with him were flight engineer Sgt. Alan Furber, navigator F/O Arthur Leonard, bomb-aimer Sgt. Harry Bailey, wireless operator Sgt. William Roberts and gunners Sgt. George Dennis and Sgt. Tom Hooper.

Joe's name can be found on panel 076.
