

Sgt. Arthur Trivett
1587176 RAFVR

Arthur Trivett was a 21-year-old mid-upper gunner from Devon who died along with five of his crew in a raid on Leipzig in February 1944.

His aircraft, Lancaster III LM384 (CF-X) (pictured) of 625 Squadron, had taken off from Kelstern shortly before midnight on the night of 19 February as part of a force of 833 bombers heading to attack aircraft factories in Leipzig. It was a bad night for Bomber Command when 78 aircraft were shot down, including three from 625 Squadron.

It is believed that the Lancaster was intercepted outbound by a night-fighter and shot down, crashing close to the village of Bledeln, south of Hanover. The only survivor was the bomb-aimer, Sgt. George Paterson

Adam and his crew had joined 625 Squadron earlier in February from 1656 Heavy Conversion Unit at Lindholme. Four of the casualties, including Arthur, were buried locally before being reinterred in Hanover War Cemetery after the war, while two others are remembered on the Runnymede Memorial.

Born in the East Stonehouses area of Plymouth he was one of five children of William and Elsie Trivett.

The others who died were the pilot Flt. Sgt. Charles Pearson, flight engineer Sgt. Adam Sinclair, navigator F/O Jack Pearl RCAF, wireless operator Sgt. George Cartwright and rear gunner Sgt. Thomas Evans.

His name can be found on panel 108.
